THIS IS UNEVALUATED INFORMATION

1. The Women's Hospital was located in a section of Stalino called "Laringa". The General Manager of the hospital was a German and he was the only non-Soviet attached to the hospital staff. There were 41 doctors stationed at the hospital, 11-16 of whom were women. The doctors were mostly between the ages of 30 and 35 and had received their medical education in the Stalino Medical Institute. Two or three of the doctors were from Kiev and Leningrad and several from other cities. There were 16 nurses stationed at the hospital, both graduate and practical. Most of the nurses were married. The practical nurses had completed one year and eight months of training and the graduate nurses had between two and a half and three years of training. The Soviet head of the hospital was Dr. Gregory Elushov, born about 1900. He handled most of the critical operations. His assistant was Dr. Maria Dragoon, a Jewess.
2. There were over two hundred beds in the hospital. Most rooms contained four beds; there were a few rooms with two beds. The hospital had two Soviet-built ambulances. The medical equipment was said by the doctors to be good by Soviet standards. I do not know where the medicine and drugs came from, all having Latin inscriptions. The hospital had its own wells for spring water, but received its electricity from the city. There was no generator on the hospital grounds. Cesspools disposed of the sewage and city collectors removed the garbage.
3. The hospital handled gynecology cases only, the majority being obstetrical cases. Every person who entered the hospital had to have a card from a doctor in the State Clinic. After the treatment was completed, the patient's employer was billed. The hospital submitted an annual budget to the government within which it was necessary to operate. All the hospital employees were paid by the government. Doctors received 400 to 600 rubles per month. The pay of the personnel and the prices of goods remained the same under the Nazi occupation.
4. Maternity patients were kept in bed for seven days and in the hospital for 12 days. The children were kept in a special room in the hospital. The doctors refused to have anything to do with abortions.
5. The following is a free-hand sketch of the two floors of the hospital. It was of stone construction and was built about 1935. Annotations on the sketch are:
